SCHEDULE

Marston (Lion Salt Works) Conservation Area

Description of Area

The Conservation Area consists of the Lion Salt Works and their immediate surroundings.

The works date from 1842 and are of industrial-archaeological importance in that they contain what is believed to be the last working open-pan process based on brine pumping. The works contain a beam type engine and boilers, steam windlass, five open pans heated by horizontal brick-lined flues, drying galleries, crushing and bagging plant, workshops and offices.

The Conservation Area is divided into two by the Trent and Mersey Canal. South of the canal the area includes the works, a group of contemporary terraced houses, land south of the works crossed by the old link to the Cheshire Lines Railway, and land west of the works forming part of the site of the original Ollershaw Lane Mine. North of the canal are two ponds, originally the site of the Adelaide Works, which now form attractive landscape features.

Boundary

Starting at the canal bridge the boundary runs northwards along the east side of Ollershaw Lane then turns east to include the pond (O.S. parcel 1962) and O.S. parcel 2471. The boundary then returns to Ollershaw Lane, crosses south of the old school and runs in a generally westerly direction including the large pond (O.S. parcel 1273) and woodland (O.S. parcel 9768). It crosses the canal, runs south-east and includes the Inn and six adjoining terrace cottages. Crossing Ollershaw Lane the line follows the rear boundaries of houses in Ollershaw Lane and Cross Street then north-eastwards to the canal, then along the north bank to the bridge.
