It is well established that BCG vaccination of contacts confers protection against tuberculosis and it is especially useful in this respect for new-born infants of tuberculous mothers or infants born into tuberculous households. However, under such circumstances segregation is necessary until Mantoux testing has shown conversion. This undesirable segregation period of a few weeks can be abolished by giving isoniazid to the infant from birth, but the adoption of this procedure suffers from the disadvantage that concurrent administration of isoniazid interferes with the response to normal BCG vaccine. This can be avoided by the use of an isoniazid resistant BCG vaccine, when administration of isoniazid need only continue until the post-BCG tuberculin test becomes positive.	1st January, 2001
