From the 15th of April last, a fire or a light has been lighted in the port of Nieupoort, a province of Western Flanders, which points out at each tide when there are three yards eight palmes (or fourteen Flemish feet) of water on the bar before the said port, and which is extinguished when the tide is as low as four yards four palmes (or sixteen feet).

This light can be perceived at a distance of five marine miles, of fifteen in the degree, in coming from the west in the direction of south south east, and in coming from the east in the direction of south south west, at a distance of four miles.

In entering the port, the light must be seen in the southern point, eighteen east.
