

lived in the hearts of his faithful people, and whose loss has occasioned universal sympathy and regret.

We feel deeply sensible that His late Majesty fully maintained the mighty influence of his Crown among the civilized nations of the world, while he cultivated with exemplary care the blessings of foreign and domestic tranquillity; and the citizens of London must ever remember with the highest gratification that, under His late Majesty's auspices, the metropolis of the British Empire has been continually advancing in importance and dignity, and increasing in magnificence and splendour.

While we offer the tribute of our unfeigned respect for the memory of your Majesty's late illustrious Brother, we humbly tender to your Majesty our sincere congratulations on your accession to the Throne of your Ancestors:

Ever loyal and attached to the House of Brunswick, we look forward with peculiar satisfaction to the reign of a Prince of that House who has devoted a considerable portion of his life to the service of his country, and in the promotion of the interests of its royal navy, on which so much of the strength and glory of the United Kingdom depends: and we remember, with especial gratitude, your Majesty's regard for our privileges, your numerous acts of condescension to us and to our fellow citizens, and your personal and munificent protection of many of the charities of the metropolis, which are justly the pride and boast of the nation.

With these lively impressions of your Majesty's goodness, and relying on the wisdom and integrity of your Majesty's councils, we anticipate, with perfect confidence, that our glorious constitution will be preserved inviolate, and the happiness of your Majesty's people, and the honour of the British Empire, will be cherished and enhanced during your Majesty's reign.

We entreat your Majesty to accept our assurances of the unfeigned attachment of your Majesty's faithful citizens of London to your Majesty, and to your amiable and illustrious Consort, Queen Adelaide, the ornament and example of her sex; and we earnestly trust that it may please Divine Providence to protect and preserve your Majesty long to govern a loyal and free people, and that prosperity and happiness may attend your Majesty's reign.

Signed by order of Court, Henry Woodthorpe.

To which Address His Majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious Answer:

"I thank you for this loyal and affectionate address, for the justice which you have rendered to the memory of my lamented Brother, as well as for your cordial expressions of warm and dutiful attachment to myself and my beloved Consort, the Queen.

In these expressions I place an implicit confidence, and I assure you in return, with perfect truth, that the welfare of my good city of London, the metropolis of the great empire committed to my charge, will always be among the first objects of my solicitude."

They were all very graciously received; and had the honour of kissing His Majesty's hand.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

The humble Address of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

WE, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford, humbly approach your Royal presence with our sincere condolence on the demise of our late most gracious and beloved Sovereign, and our respectful and cordial congratulations on the accession of your Majesty to the Throne of your Ancestors.

In common with the whole nation, we gratefully look back on the long period during which your Majesty's illustrious Brother ruled over us as Regent or as King. Never can we forget his firmness and energy in war; his mild and constitutional government in peace; his munificent encouragement of arts, literature, and science; and the various marks of his especial and condescending favour repeatedly vouchsafed to that ancient seat of learning to which we belong.

But, amidst our sorrows for such a loss, we derive consolation from the thought, that the Sceptre is now swayed by another Son of the same venerated Sire; by a Prince, whose name, like that of His late Majesty, adorns the rolls of our University; who, trained in British principles and British feelings, assisted, in early youth, to fight the battles and uphold the naval renown of our country, and on the patriotism of whose riper years that country may confidently rely for parental care and protection.

In accordance with these sentiments, we shall labour to inculcate a dutiful and affectionate reverence for your Majesty's august Person and Family, an enlightened love of just subordination and well-regulated freedom, and, above all, the sacred obligation of Christian loyalty; always adding our most fervent prayers, that the reign of which we now hail the
