The mining property known as the Pendleton Colliery, situate two and a half miles only from the Royal Exchange of the city of Manchester, comprising the Fitzgerald Mines, the Daehy Mines, and the Blomeley Mines, extending under about 662 acres of land, with the requisite surface rights; the mines at present open for working embrace four valuable seams called the Albert, Ram, New, and Binn Mines, producing coals of excellent quality, which are in good demand in the immediate neighbourhood, both for private and manufacturing purposes, and by means of the River Irwell, the Bolton and Bury Canal, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, are available for the extensive markets in the important manufacturing districts round Manchester, and with a right of free toll over the suspension bridge leading into Broughton, the most important suburb of Manchester, thereby securing a large private trade. The property is held direct from the freeholders, under leases containing covenants most favourable to lessees, the chief part being for a term of which forty-four years are unexpired, at rents amounting in the whole to annual rental of £850, with royalties averaging only £40 per statute acre of coal worked, and the mines are underleased to Messrs. Andrew Knowles and Sons, with covenants similar to the original lease, for the whole term, at the improved rent of £1,436 per annum, thus producing a profit rent of £586 per annum, exclusive of royalties, which average £100 per statute acre of coal worked, a large prospective increasing income being thus obtained. A large outlay has been made by the lessees in sinking shafts and in erecting plant and machinery all of the most improved and substantial character, and the works are being carried on with great spirit and in a highly satisfactory manner.

Printed particulars and conditions of sale (with plans annexed) may be obtained (gratis) in London, of Messrs. Cooper and Hodgson, Solicitors, No. 3, Verulam-buildings, Gray's-inn; of Messrs.
