Day signal, red flag on eastern yard-arm; meaning or depth on bar, 9 feet; night signal, red light shown from signal cabin.

Day signal, ball over red flag on eastern yard-arm; meaning or depth on bar,  $9\frac{1}{4}$  feet.

Day signal, blue flag on eastern yard-arm; meaning or depth on bar,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  feet; night signal, green light shown from signal cabin.

Day signal, ball over blue flag on eastern yard-arm; meaning or depth on bar,  $9\frac{3}{4}$  feet.

Day signal, two balls on eastern yard-arm; meaning or depth on bar, 10 feet; night signal, white light shown from signal cabin.

Day signal, red flag at topmast head; meaning or depth on bar, bar dangerous; night signal, red light shown from Pilot's house to outgoing vessels.

The figures signalled are those indicated by the tide gauge inside the heads. Mariners take the bar at their own discretion, as it is impossible that the exact depth signalled should be guaranteed, and those wishing the night tidal signals to be made must give four short blasts with the fog-signal, and, after they have been made, one long blast, showing that they are understood.

Pilots will, if the weather permits, board vessels outside the bar: when this is not the case, vessels should be steered with the leading lights in line, and they will be directed by signals from the flag-staff, as follows:—

a. A pennant at eastern yard-arm indicates alter course to the eastward.

b. A pennant at western yard-arm indicates alter course to the westward.

The pennant will be kept hoisted until it is observed that a safe course is being steered; no signal will otherwise be made.

When unable to go outside, the pilot will, if practicable, come out in a boat and direct the vessel's course by a flag waved on that side of the boat to which the course is to be altered.

Strangers should not attempt to enter at night, and no sailing vessel should cross the bar on an ebb tide without a commanding breeze.
