FRIDAY, 7 APRIL, 1933

Whitehall, April 5, 1933.

The following Address was presented to The KING on the occasion of the opening by His Majesty of the new wing of the National Portrait Gallery on the 30th March, 1933.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY.

The Trustees would beg leave to remind Your Majesties that the National Portrait Gallery was founded in response to a humble address from the House of Lords to the Queen in 1856.

The collection of portraits then formed was first opened to the public in a house in Great George Street and consisted of 56 pictures.

Forty years later it was moved to the building in St. Martin's Lane, presented by William Henry Alexander. The new wing is an extension of this building.

At that time the collection numbered 1,036 individual portraits, to-day it comprises nearly 3,000. And as it commemorates those who have attained eminence in all branches of national activity, it must continue to expand and need further space for its display.

In recognition of this need plans for an extension were drawn up as long ago as 1914, when the walls of the old Gallery were already so crowded that it was difficult to exhibit the pictures to advantage. The scheme, however, had to give way to more urgent demands. In 1928 the Royal Commission on Museums and Galleries reported that among the most pressing requirements was an enlargement of the National Portrait Gallery. It was then that Lord Duveen, who had already given an addition to the National Gallery and a new wing to the Tate besides other public benefactions in the cause of Art, offered to present to the Nation an extension to this Gallery, and also new galleries to the British Museum and the Tate Gallery, provided that the other work recommended by the Royal Commission were undertaken by Your Majesty's Government. The undertaking was given, and all the three buildings recommended by the Royal Commission, and for which Lord Duveen has made himself responsible, are now either in being, in progress or in plan. The present building is the first to be completed, and it is anticipated that for a generation at least the claims of this collection dedicated to national achievement will be satisfied.

The increase in the number of portraits exhibited during 77 years has been specially noteworthy from the fact that more than half of our great collection has reached us by gift or bequest.

In the present year under the will of Lord Dillon, who was for 20 years Chairman of the Trustees and whose interest in the Gallery was unremitting, we have received four portraits of the first importance. To-day we are able to announce that in celebration of Your Majesty's visit Lord Wakefield has offered to the Nation through the Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery a munificent gift of modern portraits, and the National Art-Collections' Fund has acquired from Messrs. Knoedlers and presented to the Gallery a picture of outstanding artistic and historic interest.

Through such continuing public spirit the Gallery has attained a position unique in the world as a sequence of historical portraits. We gratefully recognise that nothing in equal measure could so maintain and encourage this spirit of generosity as the gracious assent of Your Majesty to open these galleries. They must always occupy a foremost position in the heritage of the Nation, for here national history is unfolded in the portraits of those who have themselves made that history, and here Your Majesties will see your illustrious Predecessors and the Ministers by whom they were served, the captains who won renown by sea and land, as well as those who in all other fields of human endeavour and adventure have added lustre to our race.

To which Address His Majesty was pleased to return the following Gracious Answer:—

The Queen and I have come here to-day with great pleasure to open this new wing of the National Portrait Gallery.

I thank you sincerely for your Address and for reminding me that this Gallery was founded in response to an Address to the Throne in 1856. My Grandfather took a warm and active interest in the project and among the many eminent supporters of the scheme was one whose grandson, I am glad to note, is among the present Trustees. To the Lord Stanhope who moved the Address in 1856 and first aroused public attention to the value of a Collection of Historic Portraits, this Gallery owes its origin.

The faith and foresight of the founders have been justified: from small beginnings there has developed a remarkable Collection, for which additional space has long been needed.

The generosity of William Henry Alexander in presenting to the Nation the original building 40 years ago, has been repeated in our own time by Lord Duveen, who has added to his many public benefactions the gift of this beautiful new wing. The presentation of so many of the portraits is further evidence of the same spirit.

I rejoice to hear of your recent acquisitions and am confident that this readiness to enrich the Gallery will continue.

The men and women whose faces look down from the walls of the Gallery have this common claim to a place here. All have won distinction in many fields of human endeavour, each in some memorable way has helped to shape the fortunes, traditions and thoughts of the British People. The Trustees, both past and present, are to be congratulated on the success of a comprehensive and discriminating policy with regard to the selection of portraits.

To reanimate the past and to quicken in each succeeding generation a sense of the continuity of our national story is the great and worthy trust of this Gallery. In the full confidence that the achievements of the future will equal in lustre those of the past, I declare open this new wing of the National Portrait Gallery.
