Whitehall, March 19, 1946.

The KING has been pleased to award the Edward Medal to William Waterson in recognition of his gallantry in the following circumstances:—

At 4.30 a.m. on Saturday the 18th August, 1945, two workmen employed in the carbon-black plant at the works of the General Electric Company, Ltd., Birmingham, were engaged in collecting newly manufactured lamp black from a brick chamber. The men were unprotected and had to withstand a high temperature as well as an unpleasant atmosphere due to particles of oily lamp black, while carbon monoxide was present from burning soot. After a short time Webb, one of the workmen, collapsed and his companion, Albert Edward Stranks, being unable to move him, sought assistance. Breathing apparatus was stored at the works fire station some distance away; when Stranks called for help, the fire alarm was properly sounded. To await the arrival of breathing apparatus would inevitably have resulted in some delay and as the event conclusively proved, there was no time to lose. William Waterson, who was the first to arrive on the scene after the alarm was given, joined Stranks and in order to avoid any delay in going to Webb's assistance, without hesitation though fully realising the risk, entered the chamber and attempted to pull the man out. Webb was covered in sweat and carbon black and rescue work was difficult as it was not possible to get a proper grip on him. They were unsuccessful at first and on coming out Stranks collapsed; but Waterson continued to make attempts, entering four times in all. On his last entry he was accompanied by John Thomas Hewitt, a member of the works Fire Brigade, who had then arrived with a rope but not with the breathing apparatus; together they succeeded in bringing Webb out, who, unfortunately, was found to be dead.

The hazards were serious owing to the presence of the carbon monoxide gas, intense heat, complete darkness except for the light from a portable acetylene lamp (the carbon covered surroundings absorb all light and give no reflection), the deposit of carbon black and the confined space, conditions to which Waterson and Hewitt were unaccustomed.

Both Waterson and Stranks suffered badly from gassing and were removed to hospital, and Hewitt suffered to a lesser extent.

Whitehall, April 2, 1946.
