FRIDAY, 22 NOVEMBER, 1946

Whitehall, November 15, 1946.

On the occasion of the visit to Oxford on Thursday 24th October of His Majesty The King, who was accompanied by Her Majesty The Queen, the Chancellor of the University and the Public Orator of the University delivered the following Addresses at a Special Convocation in the Sheldonian Theatre.

The Chancellor said:—

Your Majesty. Many among us have the pleasure of recalling your first introduction to this Theatre and of linking it in memory with a later day, just fifteen years ago, when your Royal Consort was also graciously pleased to associate herself with our work and aspirations. In the years of tension, of battle, and of victory that have ensued, the two-fold lustre then added to our Doctorate has grown in brilliance with the eminence of your stations, the magnitude of your public services, and the ever-deepening affection of your people.

We are proud, Sir, that the name of your Royal Sister is connected with the first provision made for Bodley's new expansion. We are proud, too, that the new Bodleian building is inscribed with the name of Her Majesty Queen Mary, whom we venture once again to assure of our enduring gratitude and most loyal devotion.

Since that foundation-stone was laid by her hand, the English-speaking peoples have again been united in a brotherhood of arms. Of their common effort in promoting the arts of peace, and of their common heritage, the New Bodleian is a monument and symbol; and with the Old it will enshrine, in the sight of all nations, the Vestal fire of our European civilization, a steady flame that by God's good grace no power of darkness shall overcome.

We are deeply thankful, Sir, for your royal favour and we beg you to receive our words of welcome as no mere formality but as the language of the heart.

The Public Orator said:—

Rex augustissime, Stator Britannici nominis, tuque, Regina excelsissima, totius populi amor ac deliciae.

Tametsi nulla potest oratio aut benignitati vestrae par inveniri aut gaudium quod ex adventu vestro capimus universi—neque enim mediocri honore nos sentimus affectos—vetat tamen pietas eum silere cui traditum est munus oratorum ab ipso Thoma Bodleio aliquando susceptum.

Credite nos inenarrabili quodam studio Oxoniam vos reversos salutare. Scimus enim quam grave onus officii vobis sit impositum, quot itinera sitis emensi, quibus denique belli tenebris circumfusam patriam quo virtutis, laboris, patientiae exemplo in quantum lucem quantumque splendorem perduxeritis.

Tibi, Rex et Imperator, ne debellatis quidem hostibus datur missio; nec iam te totius imperii curis districtum advocarem, nisi materna manu et sororia incohatum opus te posceret confectorem. et certe rege dignum obibus officium. Bodleius enim ille

'totius litterati orbis ambitu munificentiam suam terminavit': quique 'nihil satis actum putavit, nisi suis immensis sumptibus futurorum liberalitatem invitasset', hodie vel illud posset gloriari, se gentes toto orbe divisas ad unum dandi studium excitasse.

Voto finienda est oratio. Domine Deus, qui hanc Britannici imperii molem in tantum fastigium extulisti, conserva hunc statum, custodi Regem et Reginam Matremque Regis, protege Principissam Elizabetham totamque regiam domum, Regique functo longissima statione mortali destina successores quam serissimos.

Of which the following is the English translation:—

Most august Sovereign, Stablisher of Britain's name, and you, Madam, Most Excellent in your Majesty, Queen of the hearts of a whole people.

No oratory could do justice to the gracious kindness of your visit, nor to the happiness brought to every one of us by the great honour of receiving you. Yet the refuge of silence is denied to the Public Orator by respect for antiquity; for the office which he inherits was once held by Thomas Bodley himself.

Be assured that we greet your return to Oxford with a loyalty too deep for full expression. We know the weight of the duties laid upon you. We know the many journeys you have undertaken. We know how your high example of courage, strenuous effort, and endurance guided our country through the dark night of war into the fullness and splendour of day.

For you, Sir, the King-Emperor, even the overthrow of your enemies brings no release from national service. We dare call you away from imperial cares only because a task initiated by your Mother and your Sister awaits the final touch of your own hand. The service we ask is worthy of a king; for 'Bodley's munificence embraced the whole lettered world'. It was said of him that 'he thought poorly, of his achievement, unless his own huge disbursements evoked the bounty of posterity'. Today he might even claim to have brought two hemispheres together in eager contribution to a single cause.

Last of all, a prayer. Lord God, who hast raised up this Britannic Empire to so proud an eminence, uphold us in this high station. Preserve and protect our King and Queen, the Queen-Mother, the Princess Elizabeth, and all the Royal Family. Grant our King the fullest span of mortal life, and prolong his royal line from generation to generation.

To which Addresses His Majesty was pleased to make the following gracious Answer:—

Mr. Chancellor. I thank you and the Public Orator for your speeches and the whole University for the welcome it has given to the Queen and myself. For both of us this Theatre holds proud and happy memories. We rejoice that it stands as we saw it before, and that everywhere the familiar beauties of this ancient University remain untouched by war: bearing witness, as the best of all visible memorials, to the valour and self-sacrifice of yet another generation.

Oxford, from her very origins, has been true to the noble ideal of a world-wide commonwealth of scholars. She affirms it in her assemblies by the use of Latin speech,—the currency of humanism, linking together not only the nations but the centuries. She affirmed it during the war by receiving homeless students from Czechoslovakia and Poland and many other countries. If Bodley's library "enshrines the Vestal fire of our European civilization," that is because by the very terms of the Founder's dedication it has always served the whole world of scholarship, not Oxford alone, and because in its oldest precincts the great humanists of the past are living spirits whose presence can yet be felt.

The past lives in Bodley's library; but his library does not live in the past. From the earliest days it was rich in foreign books, which, as the first Librarian stated, would increase in usefulness as our overseas trade expanded. We read, too, that the Founder himself commissioned the purchase of manuscripts in Syriac, Arabic, Turkish, and Persian. Did he not, with unknowing foresight, prepare the way for our war-time censors in the Middle East, where, with help from Oxford, over 90 different languages were read?

No detail of library management was too small for Sir Thomas Bodley and no conception of a library's purpose was too great. Were he here today, he would approve the careful planning of the new building, dependent upon inspection of more than fifty libraries elsewhere; he would rejoice at the international goodwill that made such inspection possible; and above all he would be thankful for the lead given by the New World to the Old in providing so generously for future needs.

Let me end by quoting some words spoken in Oxford three-quarters of a century ago. "There is a destiny now possible to us, the speaker said,—the highest ever set before a nation. . . . We have been taught a religion of pure mercy, which we must either now finally betray, or learn to defend by fulfilling . . . Within the last few years we have had the laws of natural science opened to us with a rapidity which has been blinding by its brightness; and means of transit and communication given to us, which have made but one kingdom of the habitable globe . . . Will you, youths of England, make your country again . . . a sceptred isle, for all the world a source of light, a centre of peace; mistress of Learning and of the Arts, faithful guardian of great memories . . . ; faithful servant of time-tried principles . . . ; and, amidst the cruel and clamorous jealousies of the nations, worshipped in her strange valour, of goodwill towards men?"

These words, by which John Ruskin fired the heart of Cecil Rhodes, have a clear application today. Never was there greater need for a world-wide commonwealth of scholars, in both science and the arts, and for a library of great traditions to serve them. I am proud that your New Bodleian bears on its foundation-stone my mother's name and that I am to have the privilege of declaring it open.

On the occasion of the Opening of the New Bodleian Library the Vice-Chancellor of the University said:—

The Bodleian Library was first opened to readers on the eighth of November, 1602, when another Queen Elizabeth still sat upon the English throne. Its founder, Sir Thomas Bodley, foresaw the need for future library extension. "In the process of time," he said, "there must of necessity be very great want of storage of books, by reason of the endless multitude of those that are present there and like hereafter to be continually bought and brought in". Ever since his time, shelf-space has been a major preoccupation of successive librarians. The building in which we are assembled today is calculated to solve the problem for a couple of centuries to come, as well as to give to library-users reading facilities which they have never had in the past. Its construction has been made possible by the great munificence of the Rockefeller Foundation and by the generosity of the many subscribers—members of the University and others—who responded to the University's appeal. When the necessary funds had been secured and plans by our architect, Sir Giles Gilbert Scott, had been approved, your Royal Mother, Sir, Her Majesty Queen Mary, honoured us by laying the foundation stone.

The building had been brought to within a few months of completion when war broke out. It has already proved of much service to the University. It has provided in war-time a range of rooms in which national work of great importance has been carried on. Its basements have given shelter to the treasures of many other libraries. Now it stands ready to serve the uses for which it was originally planned. From the time of James I many kings and queens and princes of your house have honoured the Bodleian Library by their visits. Your visit today, Sir, is the more memorable since you have come to inaugurate a new era in Bodleian history. It is my privilege, on behalf of the University, to request your Majesty to declare the New Library open.

To which Address His Majesty was pleased to return the following gracious Answer:—

The Queen and I are glad that at last, after long delay caused by the war, we are able to visit Oxford so that I may open this great new building of the Bodleian Library. Its foundation stone was laid in 1937 by my mother, Queen Mary; at that date the building of a larger home for the famous store of books and for the future growth of the library was, after long and careful consideration, put in hand by the University of Oxford. Now, nine years later, the Library receives the new building which will provide ample space for its immense collections of manuscripts, for its printed books in all languages, for its accessions for many years to come, and for all those activities which must be carried on to maintain its high place among the libraries of universal learning.

This is a great day in the history of the Bodleian Library. On such an occasion it is proper that we should look back to the founder whose original plans have persisted, with remarkable tenacity, for more than three hundred years. Sir Thomas Bodley made an arrangement by which a great part of the output of English books should come automatically into his library. Such intake has continued uninterrupted ever since.

We now have better reason than ever before to appreciate the achievement of Sir Thomas, for grievous losses have been sustained during the war by many of our libraries, chief among them the British Museum. We must be thankful indeed that the Bodleian Library has been spared.

I am glad to learn from the Vice-Chancellor that during the war the University was able to lend part of the new building for important national business, and that books and treasure of other institutions found here a temporary refuge and safe shelter.

The new library has been made possible by the contributions of numerous benefactors, and above all by the magnificent generosity of the Rockefeller Foundation. Today I thank and congratulate them all, together with the Architect and all who have shared in planning, constructing and equipping this fine building. It is a great satisfaction to me that their enterprise has been brought to a successful conclusion.

I now declare this building open. I am confident that it will prove a most valuable addition to the resources of the University of Oxford, and that in the future Bodley's Library will always maintain that service to the advancement of learning and to the peaceful progress of mankind for which it has been renowned in the past.
