The KING has been graciously pleased to approve the posthumous award of the Albert Medal to the undermentioned for gallantry in attempting to save life at sea:—

Lieutenant Frederick Joseph HINDES, Royal Navy.

On the 12th January 1950, H.M. Submarine TRUCULENT was in collision with the Swedish Tanker DIVINA in the Thames Estuary and sank almost immediately. Lieutenant Hindes, who was First Lieutenant of the submarine, was down below at the time of the collision. By his calm demeanour and clear orders he maintained perfect discipline and was able to ensure that the greater part of those on board moved safely to the engine room and after end of the vessel before she sank. He then divided the men, probably about sixty, between the two compartments and himself took charge of the escape arrangements in the after end. When all was ready he opened the escape hatch but, despite having told one hand to hold on to him, he was blown violently out of the boat and was not seen again. Yet the sense of order which Lieutenant Hindes had instilled survived him and it is probable that all those in the after end got clear of the submarine.

Chief Engine Room Artificer Francis Walter HINE,
D.S.M., P/MX 47321.

After the men had been divided and the water tight door between the after end and the engine room had been closed, Chief Engine Room Artificer Hine took charge of the escape arrangements for the men in the engine room. This duty he performed faultlessly, taking care that the limited number of escape sets were allotted to the weakest swimmers and ensuring that the least experienced men were carefully reminded of the correct drill. Chief Engine Room Artificer Hine was the last man to leave the engine room and it is known that he reached the surface in safety but was not picked up.

The conduct of all who went down in the submarine was in full accord with the great traditions of the Royal Navy but the splendid example set by Lieutenant Hindes and Chief Engine Room Artificer Hine was beyond praise.
