Whitehall, May 13, 1958.

The following Addresses were presented to The QUEEN by the Lord Mayor of Leicester and the Chancellor of the University of Leicester respectively, on the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to the City of Leicester on 9th May, 1958, during which The QUEEN opened the Percy Gee Building at Leicester University:—

May it please Your Majesty:

On this memorable day I have the honour to welcome you and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh to this City of Leicester and I do so on behalf of everyone who shares in its life and work. We have longed for this opportunity to show you our loyalty and affection and something of the spirit of what is the very heart of England.

We take pride in our history which dates from Roman and Anglo Saxon times. This afternoon Your Majesty will pass the site where Simon de Montfort summoned the first English Parliament, where King Richard III died after the battle of Bosworth Field and where the Roman Forum stood. In this place with such ancient roots in history, Your Majesty will today see the living, industrial Leicester; that Leicester which is chiefly known today by its industry and the skills of its people.

Your Majesty will visit one of those industries which helps to found the claim that Leicester clothes the world and see something of the great contribution which women make to our economy. We are also known for those scientific and engineering processes in which Prince Philip has shown his interest: all those who work in them are grateful for His Royal Highness' encouragement. We hope that we shall have the pleasure of showing you these on another day and that this, your first visit to our City, will be no more than an introduction.

But it is not only the material affairs of life which concern us: we share with the University their sense of purpose and endeavour which is recognised and made memorable by Your Majesty's visit.

No Lord Mayor can serve this City without a sense of pride in its achievements and the citizens whom he represents. Today I speak for all of them; the old people from our Homes who watched you walk into this Hall, the youth who will line our parks this afternoon as you drive past, and those who through work or illness cannot share our great pleasure in seeing Your Majesty. We all wish you great happiness and we thank Your Majesty and Prince Philip for the pleasure which you have given by visiting us.

May it please Your Majesty:

All of us in this University and City rejoice in the great honour that you and his Royal Highness have done us by your visit. In the name of all the members of the University—Council, Senate, staff and students—I offer Your Majesty our humble duty and our most loyal and hearty welcome.

The City's welcome Your Majesty has already heard from its own first citizen, the Lord Mayor, and it is a special pleasure to us that University and City are alike honoured in this royal visit. The words "university city" have not always spelt a perfect union of Town and Gown, but here, Your Majesty, the ties are already close and this great day will surely draw them closer.

As Your Majesty will know, this is a great manufacturing city set in an historic countryside. The Roman settlement of the first century has become one of the principal cities of the kingdom, sending the articles of its commerce throughout the world. In education its record is already excellent and its schools and colleges have national standing, and so for many years some of its ablest men and foremost citizens have directed their efforts to this final achievement, to establishing in Leicester its own centre of higher learning.

A year ago, on the first of this month, Your Majesty graciously acceded to our Petition and granted us a Charter as the University of Leicester. We thus became the fourth of the universities of Your Majesty's creation—the new Elizabethan universities.

In your presence it would be presumptuous of me to appraise the significance of Your Majesty's most gracious act. Let me only say that this University, if yet the youngest of Your Majesty's academic family, will hope to show in zeal and performance that it is well aware of its high responsibilities.
