CENTRAL CHANCERY OF THE ORDERS OF KNIGHTHOOD

St. James's Palace, London S.W.1.

1st February 1966.

The QUEEN has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the George Medal to the under-mentioned:

Major Charles William SMITH (382835), Royal Army Ordnance Corps.

On the evening of Friday, 25th June 1965, a Belgian ammunition train caught fire in a cutting near Minden. The train had been stopped and four of the wagons uncoupled but the fire increased and two of the wagons exploded scattering shells over a wide area. Major C. W. Smith, who was at the time Senior Ammunition Technical Officer, No. 3 Detachment, No. 1 Ammunition Inspectorate, was telephoned as he was the ammunition adviser nearest to the scene, although still some 80 miles away. He immediately went to the accident with his second in command, Captain P. W. E. Istead.

On arrival at the scene they found two of the wagons devastated and burning fiercely, whilst the adjoining wooden end of a third wagon was smouldering. The surrounding area was covered with burning propellant, exploded ammunition and a number of dangerously hot 90 millimetre shells, which might have exploded at any minute. The girders of the burning wagons were red hot in places and there were still a number of unexploded rounds in the wreckage.

There was a large civilian house with a thatched roof within two hundred yards of the accident and despite the efforts of German Police a number of curious civilians were infiltrating into the area. A Royal Military Police Non-Commissioned Officer, Lance Corporal Moodie was trying to move a fire tender so that water could be played on the flames, but apart from this nothing had been done to prevent further explosions and the local fire brigade were reluctant to approach.

Major Smith at once took charge of the situation. He first persuaded the fire brigade to move a tender to the top of the cutting overlooking the scene and play water on the burning end of the third wagon. Then with complete disregard for his own safety, helped by Captain Istead, he broke into the third wagon and was just in time to move the ammunition boxes away from the burning end before they too caught fire and precipitated a further explosion. Major Smith assisted by Captain Istead and Lance Corporal Moodie then uncoupled the third and fourth wagons each containing about 10 tons of 90 millimetre ammunition and moved them about 60 yards further down the track.

Having thus prevented a further major explosion, Major Smith set about dealing with the other ammunition which lay in and around the burning wagons. In most cases the projectiles were separated from the cases but a number of complete rounds were still in smouldering cardboard cylinders. Some of the projectiles were marked "Practice" but most of them had had all their markings burnt off, and were too hot to pick up with the naked hand. They all had to be treated as suspect and it was considered that in view of the likelihood of further explosions and the difficulty of discovering whether the shells were high explosive or not, the ammunition would have to be cooled with water before clearance could commence. In order not to expose the local firemen to undue hazard Major Smith and Captain Istead handled the branch hose for the first 30 minutes of this operation. Subsequently with the aid of a fatigue party all the ammunition was unloaded and removed.

The whole operation took twelve hours to complete, from about nine in the evening when the officers arrived on the scene, until about nine thirty next morning when all the ammunition had been cleared. Throughout this period, although he was well aware of the continuous danger of further explosions, Major Smith acted with utter disregard for his own safety, and in the highest tradition of the British Army.

Captain Peter Walter Ernest ISTEAD (434900), Royal Army Ordnance Corps.

On the evening of Friday, 25th June 1965, an ammunition train caught fire near Minden. The train had been stopped and four of the wagons uncoupled but the fire increased and two of the wagons exploded scattering shells over a wide area. Captain P. W. E. Istead who was at the time Second in Command at No. 3 Detachment, No. 1 Ammunition Inspectorate, was instructed by his Officer Commanding to accompany the latter to the scene of the accident although that was still some 80 miles away.

On arrival at the scene they found two of the wagons devastated and burning fiercely whilst the adjoining wagon was also burning. The surrounding area was covered with burning propellant, exploded ammunition and a number of dangerously hot 90 millimetre shells which might have exploded at any minute. The girders of the burning wagons were red hot in places and there were still a number of unexploded rounds in the wreckage. There was a large civilian house with a thatched roof within 200 yards of the accident and despite the efforts of German Police a number of curious civilians were infiltrating into the area. A Royal Military Police Non-Commissioned Officer, Lance Corporal Moodie, was trying to move a fire tender so that water could be played on the flames but apart from this nothing had been done to prevent further explosions and the local fire brigade were reluctant to approach the burning wagons.

As soon as the fire brigade had moved a tender to the top of the cutting over-looking the scene and begun to play water on the burning end of the third wagon Captain Istead accompanied his Officer Commanding on to the railway line. Then with complete disregard for their own safety they broke into the third railway wagon and were just in time to move the ammunition boxes away from the burning end before they too caught fire and precipitated a further explosion. Immediately afterwards, Captain Istead helped his Officer Commanding and the Non-Commissioned Officer to uncouple the third and fourth wagons each containing about 10 tons of 90 millimetre ammunition and move them about 60 yards down the track.

The problem now was how to deal with the other ammunition which lay in and around the burning wagons. In most cases the projectiles were separated from the cases but a number of complete rounds were still in smouldering cardboard cylinders in and around the wagons. Some of the projectiles around the wagons were marked "Practice" but most of them had all their markings burnt off. They all had to be treated as suspect until examined. Most of the ammunition was too hot to pick up with the naked hand and it was considered that in view of the likelihood of further explosions and the difficulty of discovering whether the shells were high explosive or not the ammunition would have to be cooled with water before clearance could commence. In order not to expose the local firemen to undue hazard Captain Istead handled the branch hose, together with Major Smith for the first 30 minutes of this operation. Subsequently, with the aid of a fatigue party all the ammunition was unloaded and removed.

The whole operation took twelve hours to complete from about nine in the evening when the officers arrived on the scene until about nine thirty next morning, when all the ammunition had been cleared. Throughout this period, although he was well aware of the continuous danger of further explosions Captain Istead acted with utter disregard for his own safety. Not only was the majority of the ammunition and two of the railway trucks saved but the possibility of injury to civilians and damage to civilian property was also avoided. Captain Istead's fearless behaviour and the loyal and instant support which he gave to Major Smith was an inspiring example to those around him. His courageous actions in the face of continuous danger were in the highest traditions of the British Army.

23900762 Lance Corporal Colin Alexander MOODIE, Corps of Royal Military Police.

On the evening of Friday, 25th June 1965, an ammunition train exploded in the area of Minden. The train had been stopped and four of the wagons uncoupled but the fire increased and two of the wagons exploded scattering shells over a wide area. The German Police telephoned to Minden Garrison Headquarters and the Royal Military Police Patrol, consisting of Lance Corporal Moodie and Lance Corporal Osborn was sent to the scene.

On arrival the two Non-Commissioned Officers were stopped by a police cordon but they were allowed to go inside the area on foot and having made an appreciation they reported to their Headquarters by radio and asked for Ammunition Advisers to be sent to the scene. By this time two of the wagons were completely devastated and burning fiercely whilst the other two wagons were beginning to smoulder. The surrounding area was covered with burning propellant, exploded ammunition and a number of dangerously hot 90 millimetre shells which might have exploded at any time. The girders of the burning wagons were red hot in places and there were still a number of unexploded rounds in the wreckage. There was a large civilian house with a thatched roof within 200 yards of the accident and despite the efforts of German police a number of curious civilians were infiltrating into the area. After some discussion Lance Corporal Moodie was able to persuade the fire brigade, who were in attendance, to move a fire tender nearer to the railway line so that it could play its hoses on to the burning wagons. He was beginning to supervise this operation when the Ammunition Advisers arrived and Major Smith, the Officer in Charge, took control of the situation.

It was decided to move the two smouldering wagons further down the line as they were dangerously close to the large civilian house. Despite the danger of further explosions Lance Corporal Moodie instantly climbed down to the railway tracks and helped the two Royal Army Ordnance Corps Officers to uncouple the third and fourth wagons, each containing about 10 tons of 90 millimetre ammunition, and move them clear of the danger area. He then helped the officers to handle the hoses and play water on the ammunition; subsequently he assisted in controlling a fatigue party which had been called out from Minden Garrison to dispose of the ammunition after it had been examined.

Both before the officers arrived and after they had assumed control Lance Corporal Moodie acted with complete disregard for his own personal safety although he was well aware of all the dangers involved. His behaviour and bravery over a period of nearly twelve hours was in the highest tradition of the British Army and was a fine example to the Germans and to the other British Soldiers on the scene.
