AIR FORCE DEPARTMENT

Whitehall, London, SW1A 2HB.

31st August 1971.

The QUEEN has been graciously pleased to approve the following awards:

Air Force Cross

Master Pilot Alexander RIDDOCH (E1569347), Royal Air Force.

At 0500 hours on 6th January 1971, Master Pilot Riddoch took off from Brunei in heavy rain, poor visibility and turbulent conditions, as Captain of the leading Wessex helicopter of the Royal Brunei Malay Regiment, in answer to an urgent call from the Brunei Shell Petroleum Company for winch equipped helicopters, to assist in rescue work in the area of a floating drilling barge, "Big John", eighteen miles off Bintulu in Sarawak. It was known that there had been a severe gas flash explosion, that the barge was on fire, that the derrick had collapsed across the helicopter landing platform and that most of the seventy-seven people on board were thought to have jumped into the sea. Master Pilot Riddoch had to make the one hundred and eighty mile flight to Bintulu at low level, in the dark. There he immediately refuelled and took off to join a Shell S 61 helicopter in the disaster area. He was warned that there might be unignited gas pockets in the air near the rig and that there was a substantial risk of a second explosion, due to gas building up in the collapsed drilling hole. At about 0715 hours, as he approached the search area, he was informed that an injured man had been seen lying on the starboard after anchor grating of the barge and that the rescue boats, loaded with survivors, were unable to go alongside because of the danger of a second explosion. Master Pilot Riddoch immediately said he would attempt a rescue and informed his crew. The barge, corkscrewing in a six to eight foot swell, was still burning fiercely amidships and was partially obscured by smoke and steam. The wind was gusting at fifteen to twenty knots from the starboard quarter and this, combined with the smoke, the collapsed derrick, trailing wires and displaced antennae, made the approach to the only feasible winching point an oblique one, port side on over the collapsed derrick. Once over the barge he had under five feet clearance for the helicopter tail rotor, was hovering without visible reference points, entirely on directions from his winchman, and had to come down to less than thirty feet above the platform in order to lower his Brunei crewman safely. This he did successfully although he was being badly affected in the cockpit by fumes, smoke and heat from the barge. His winchman reported that the crewman was having difficulty in finding his way, so he moved over the barge to positions, at times nearly at sea level, where his winchman could direct the crewman to the survivor by hand signals and monitor his progress back to the winching point carrying the injured man. Master Pilot Riddoch then re-positioned the Wessex and both men were winched to safety. He was in the hover in the immediate area of the rig for eighteen minutes. Five minutes after landing the survivor at Bintulu, he took off again for the disaster area, despite the fact that he had already flown three hours that day under the most exacting flying conditions. Later he flew two further search sorties, including a further winching operation for damage control parties, once the fire had died down, flying over six hours in all. Master Pilot Riddoch was fully aware that the aircraft would not survive a second explosion or a gas pocket. He displayed superb airmanship, calmness and judgement in most hazardous and turbulent conditions and a cool, calculated, selfless courage and leadership in the finest traditions of the Royal Air Force. His actions and those of his crew earned the unqualified admiration of the seasoned and experienced Shell personnel involved in the accident. The survivor, badly burned and helpless, undoubtedly owes his life to them.

Air Force Medal

Q4220276 Sergeant Michael Richard BIRLEY, Royal Air Force.

Sergeant Birley was senior crewman and winchman of a Wessex helicopter of the Royal Brunei Malay Regiment, which was sent to Bintulu in Sarawak in the early hours of 6th January 1971, to assist in rescue work off the floating drilling barge, "Big John", eighteen miles out to sea. It was known that there had been a gas flash fire, that the rig was burning, that the derrick had collapsed across the barge's landing platform and that most of the seventy-seven people on board were thought to have jumped into the sea. After the one hundred and eighty mile flight to Bintulu, in bad weather conditions, the aircraft refuelled and immediately took off for the disaster area at about 0700 hours. The crew was briefed that there could be unignited gas pockets in the air in the immediate vicinity of the barge and that there was still a substantial risk of a secondary explosion from pressure building up in the collapsed drilling shaft. On approaching the disaster area, the Wessex received a radio message that a survivor had been seen lying on the starboard after anchor grating, but the rescue boats, loaded with survivors, could not go alongside because of the risk of a second explosion. Sergeant Birley and the Brunei crewman immediately and without hesitation informed their Captain that they were prepared to attempt a rescue. The barge was still burning fiercely amidst ships, was partially obscured by smoke and steam, and was corkscrewing in a six to eight foot swell. The wind was gusting at fifteen to twenty knots. Sergeant Birley informed his Captain that the only feasible winching point was on the port after quarter of the helicopter landing pad which, in the prevailing wind conditions, meant the helicopter approaching port side on over the collapsed derrick. As well as winching the second crewman onto an area of heaving deck not more than six foot square, Sergeant Birley had to direct his Captain, who was then hovering without visible reference points, so that the main rotors avoided the collapsed derrick, the tail rotor did not hit a broken antenna less than five feet behind it, the aircraft did not belly onto another antenna sticking up from the collapsed derrick, and so that various loose wires swinging about in the wind were avoided. Despite being badly affected by fumes, smoke and heat from the burning rig, Sergeant Birley winched the second crewman down successfully and his Captain cannot speak too highly of the calm manner in which he directed the helicopter in these extremely hazardous and turbulent conditions. Sergeant Birley quickly realised that the Brunei crewman on the deck was having difficulty in finding his way, so he calmly directed his Captain over and round the barge to positions where he could direct the second crewman by hand signals to the injured man. Then he again guided the helicopter back to the winching position and winched both men to safety, exercising the greatest care and gentleness in getting the badly burned survivor into the aircraft cabin, where he gave immediate first aid. During that day Sergeant Birley flew four further sorties into the disaster area with different Captains. These sorties included eight further winching operations on and off the same point on the barge, once the fire had died down, with the Shell damage control party and their equipment. Between 0500 hours and 1700 hours that day he was airborne for a total of eight hours and ten minutes and drove himself close to the limits of physical endurance. During the rescue, Sergeant Birley, a relatively inexperienced crewman, was aware that the Wessex could not survive a second explosion or gas pocket. He was badly affected by fumes near the rig, nevertheless he calmly directed the operation in the most hazardous conditions for a period of eighteen minutes displaying the highest standards of determination, professional skill, coolness and judgement, and great courage in the finest traditions of the Royal Air Force. His actions then, and throughout the day, earned the unqualified admiration of the seasoned and experienced Shell personnel involved. The survivor, badly burned and helpless, undoubtedly owes his life to this Wessex crew in which Sergeant Birley played the key role.

31st August 1971.
