

past his colleagues Fireman Moulton crawled ahead, disappearing into the intense heat and smoke. At this point he found Station Officer Townsley on the floor. He crawled back past his colleagues to seek the assistance of two other firemen and, with them, carried Station Officer Townsley to street level. Fireman Moulton and another fireman sought to revive Station Officer Townsley until an ambulance crew and a doctor took over. Although at this point physically and mentally exhausted, Fireman Moulton once more entered the station and became involved in search and rescue activities until he was withdrawn.

Fireman Moulton, working to the limits of his endurance, displayed devotion to duty and gallantry of a high order by repeatedly penetrating the intense heat and smoke, by locating, rescuing and attempting to resuscitate two victims of the fire, and by returning to help with yet further search and rescue work until ordered to withdraw.

Terry Alan BEBBINGTON, Constable, British Transport Police.

Constable Bebbington was on duty in a staff security cubicle in the booking hall area when the fire was first observed. He summoned the Fire Brigade by means of his radio. After liaising with three other police officers attending, leaving one to meet the Fire Brigade at street level and the other two to assist passengers to leave by various exits, he made his way down to the Piccadilly Line platforms to assist with the redirection of passengers below. He was joined by a fireman. Constable Bebbington assisted in the evacuation of passengers from the platforms and then returned to the burning escalator to help the fireman (who had been prevented by the flashover from returning to the surface to equip himself with a hose and breathing equipment). Obtaining a platform hose, the fireman, assisted by Constable Bebbington, made his way up the escalator to attempt to extinguish the flames, which now enveloped the whole of the shaft. Fluorescent tubes were bursting overhead, fabric was dropping from the ceiling and at one time a long metal handrail shot down with extreme force. Constable Bebbington, not trained, clothed or equipped for these extreme conditions, remained constantly with the fireman. Three times they made their way up the burning escalator only to retreat when the smoke and heat became intolerable. Side panels from the escalator were removed in an endeavour to reach the fire source. When in due course the fire was brought under control, Constable Bebbington was instructed to leave the scene to attend hospital for treatment for smoke inhalation.

Constable Bebbington, though untrained and unequipped for fighting fires, displayed devotion to duty and gallantry of a high order in assisting a fireman in his attempts, in dangerous and intolerable conditions, to bring the seat of the fire under control.

Stephen Terence HANSON, Constable, British Transport Police.

Constable Hanson, together with a colleague, made his way to the concourse on the top of the Piccadilly Line escalators upon hearing news of the fire on a radio transmission. His colleague went to the platforms below. Constable Hanson remained at the top of the escalators, assisting with passenger flow and evacuation from the booking hall. To avoid the fire on the Piccadilly Line escalators, a constant and heavy flow of passengers was now ascending the Victoria Line escalators, which led directly into the booking hall. The temperature increased and acrid smoke developed making the evacuation of passengers on the Victoria Line escalators now very urgent. Constable Hanson remained, urging the passengers on. A sudden flashover occurred and the heat and combustion knocked Constable Hanson to the ground. The ceiling of the ticket hall was engulfed in flames, swirling down to floor level. Constable Hanson crawled across to the escalator shouting instructions to those passengers still ascending. In making his own escape he collided with a glass panel causing extensive injuries to his right hand. By now the heat was so intense, the skin on his hands began to melt. On reaching a corridor, he continued shouting instructions to passengers to follow him. Running blindly, he was found by another constable and led to safety. He was then conveyed to hospital and detained for the treatment of extensive burns to both hands and face, an additional injury to his right hand and smoke inhalation.

Constable Hanson displayed devotion to duty and gallantry of a high order by remaining in conditions of extreme danger to direct the evacuation of passengers, and then attempting to lead them to safety, sustaining severe burns and injury in the process.
