OFSTED—Performance Of Local Education Authority Music Services Is Music To The Ears Of Budding Young Musicians

However pupils from lower income families may be missing out on the chance to learn an instrument and there is evidence of gender stereotyping. Young people are being offered good opportunities to learn to play musical instruments thanks to the support they receive from Local Education Authority music services, according to a new report published today by the Office for Standards in Education. (Ofsted) Provision of Music Services in 15 Local Education Authorities, examines the music support provided by 15 LEAs to schools. This includes instrumental and vocal tuition, support for school and area ensembles and curriculum support, including professional development for teachers. The report found that the quality of tuition was at least satisfactory and more often good or better in all the LEAs. The four most popular instruments pupils choose to learn are the violin, flute, guitar and recorder. The overall quality of ensembles was very good in almost half of the LEAs and at least satisfactory in all of them. In all 11 of the music services which provide curriculum support to schools, the overall quality of this support was good or better. David Bell, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, said: "It is quite likely that the next Jamie Cullum or Vanessa Mae may be waiting, right now, to be discovered in an English school" <http://www.nds.coi.gov.uk/>
