firff to Trapani ; but they abandoned Mola, Taormina, and all their firong Holds, though the few Men they had there might have defended them, particularly Mola, an important Poft, the Inlet into all the Country of Catanea, and fo Arong that the Spanish Garrison, though but of 50 Men, might have kept it a confiderable time. Our last Accounts from the Marquis de Lede are, that his Forces lay about Montreale and Carini, and that he was making a Line between those two Places, which are very ftrong by their Situation, and the Country very mountainous; that he had been at Palermo, but the Inhabitants would fuffer no more than five of his Followers to enter their City, and had made him promife, that his Army fhould approach no neater than within five Miles of them. It is believed he will not be able to defend himfelf in fo large an Extent of Ground, and that when Count Mercy has joined General Zumjungen at Trapani with the Remainder of the Imperial Army, they will march to attack the Marquis de Lede, and that upon their Approach the Spaniards, who are tired with their continued Hardships and Fatigues, but have hitherto been kept to-gether by the Fear of falling into the Hands of the Peafants, will defert in great Numbers and come over to the Imperialists: So that we look upon the War in Sicily to be drawing apace towards a Conclusion.
